Project Description (attach additional pages if necessary)

Located in the Brownsville neighborhood of Brooklyn, the new firehouse is intended to become a tool for instruction, enabling the Company to stage and simulate a wide range of emergency conditions in, on, and around the building. The building's primary structure and enclosure consist of precast concrete panels and poured concrete floors. To enhance the Company's training, the new firehouse is organized around a large interior void, a space that extends from the ground to roof level. The void enables the team to practice rescue scenarios that mimic conditions common to the city, using its height and associated elements of balconies, bridge, doorways, ladders, and stairs. On the exterior, red glazed terracotta panels surround a smaller-scale series of voids—windows and doors—with highly crafted details animating these points of connection between the firehouse and the community it serves. A green roof, geothermal HVAC system, and solar hot-water heating system reduce energy use, lowering the building's carbon footprint.
